

The background of the cover is an abstract geometric composition. It features a large, solid red shape that resembles a stylized letter 'M' or a jagged mountain peak. This red shape is set against a white background. The white background is divided into several angular sections by the red shape and other white lines, creating a complex, non-representational pattern. The overall aesthetic is minimalist and modern, characteristic of mid-century abstract art.

LEON POLK SMITH
Big Form, Big Space

The Contemporary Art Gallery presents the first solo exhibition of work by Leon Polk Smith (1906-1996) in a public gallery in Canada.

Leon Polk Smith was an American painter. His lifelong commitment to geometry, shape, brilliant colour and minimal, intense compositions predated, influenced and outlasted the heydays of hard-edge painting and minimalism. While his focus on geometric abstraction was initially influenced by Piet Mondrian and his style often associated with the hard-edge school of which he is considered one of the founders, it is only now that Smith's singular artistic vision has become more fully contextualized beyond formal analysis through a growing sequence of exhibitions surveying the artist's previously understudied background and identity.

Leon Polk Smith, installation view from 'Big Form, Big Space', Contemporary Art Gallery, Vancouver, May 14 – August 22, 2021. Photography by SITE Photography.

Born near Chickasha, Oklahoma a year before it became a state, to parents of mixed Cherokee and settler heritage, Smith grew up in a farming community among the Choctaw and Chickasaw peoples. He graduated from East Central University in Ada, Oklahoma in 1934, before moving to New York City in 1936, where he attended Columbia University. He remained in New York for the rest of his life.

Early on in his time in New York, Smith began to work at the newly-founded Museum of Non-Objective Art (later the Solomon R. Guggenheim Museum) where he encountered the works of modernists such as Piet Mondrian, Constantin Brancusi and Jean Arp. Smith was captivated by these renderings of geometry and space, this focus on harnessing energy within two-dimensional surfaces would remain a principal concern throughout his career. Much of Smith's work was inspired by the interchangeability between flat, positive and negative space and in using as few elements as possible to create a convincing space, object or motion of optical tension.

Focusing primarily on paintings and works on paper from the 1950s, the exhibition identifies a pivotal moment in the development of Smith's visual language and heralds what was to come in his iconic works from the 1960s and 1970s, characterised by a series of compositions that furthered the move from rectilinear and single-panel works to the use of curvilinear form, shaped canvases and multi-part installations. Reflective both of prevalent trends of the time and an increasing engagement with the contexts of his upbringing and identity, the shift in Smith's practice during this decade evidences a move away from the geometry of his formative years into works featuring curved, organic, anthropomorphic forms of two colours in dialogue, with a playful wit present in the juxtaposition of shapes and space, and into a use of canvases which were round or other non-standard shapes.

Left: Leon Polk Smith, untitled, 1955, oil on paper, 22.5 x 19.5 inches.

Right: Leon Polk Smith, untitled, 1962, paint on cardboard (from artist pad), 23.875 x 19 inches.

Both Courtesy of and Copyright by The Leon Polk Smith Foundation, New York City. Photo by Adam Reich.

Smith neither downplayed nor foregrounded his cultural background or his identity as a gay man. Indeed, toward the end of his life he seemed more open to seeing his art through such lenses. These facts become interesting moments in which to establish a re-reading of the artist's work from a contemporary standpoint. For example, in the series of untitled collages and paintings on paper from 1955 onwards, we might recognise the fragmented shapes, arcs and interlocking forms as corporeal, arguably most overtly pictured in Red Petals (1960). Colours meet against curved edges, forcing us to imagine that which is not seen and complete the interrupted forms beyond the work itself while it simultaneously occupies space to become a thing in the world as both image and object.

Leon Polk Smith, installation view from 'Big Form, Big Space', Contemporary Art Gallery, Vancouver, May 14 – August 22, 2021. Photography by SITE Photography.

Stretch of Black No.5 (1954) and Untitled (1953) make plain connections to his background and upbringing in Native American contexts and how he applied this experience to apparently non-objective “modernist” canvases. Furthermore, the titles, form, palette and composition of paintings such as Rowell (1957), Arizona Heat Wave (1958) and Pontotoc (1958) also firmly place the work in connection to the land, sky and people of the part of the US where he grew up. Smith’s refraction of Native American and Southwestern experience through these conventions however is not merely echoed in the titles of certain works, but can also be seen in his tondos such as Black White Repeat with Red No. 2 (1953) which are not simply round canvases but also evocative of the designs and patterns of the Plains tribes.

Comprising around forty works, the exhibition charts the key moment of transformation in Smith’s oeuvre and creates a timely opportunity to re-evaluate Smith’s place not only within art history but within a contemporary moment in which the potential inherent within Smith’s work and its embrace of multi-layered meaning rooted in form and space, context and identity.

Left: Leon Polk Smith, untitled, 1957, paper on paper (embossed), 31.5 x 25 inches.

Right: Leon Polk Smith, untitled, 1957, paper on paper, 31.5 x 25 inches

Both Courtesy of and Copyright by The Leon Polk Smith Foundation, New York City. Photo by Adam Reich.

Guest curated by Nigel Prince

Following its presentation in Vancouver, the exhibition will be shown at Palm Springs Art Museum in spring 2022.

A catalogue to accompany the exhibition, including a series of commissioned essays, will be published by Black Dog Press and launched at the end of August 2021.

With generous support from the Leon Polk Smith Foundation and Lisson Gallery, London, New York and Shanghai.

Cover image

Leon Polk Smith, untitled, 1961, paint on canvasette (paper canvas), 23.625 x 18.875 inches. Courtesy of and Copyright by The Leon Polk Smith Foundation, New York City. Photo by Adam Reich.